Although the play is not one of great power, it fulfils it, mission of turnishing an evening's entertainment, and many of the lines are laugh-provoking. The place in some of its scenes is weak in its construction, noticeably so in that of the third act, when Flotsam's supposed faither makes known his real identity, and pretends that he is tired of carried the shelter of his roof for section of the place, and allows the plant of the plan following in Richmond distinctly her own, appeared at the Academy yes-
